

SAN LUIS OBISPO- February 7th, 2020: In order to get new content to post on the Calpolysleeps Instagram account, the anonymous account holder scrolls through their direct messages, a common practice the current holder has done almost daily for two years. Even though the original owner of the account, created in 2013, posted mostly original pictures, the most recent owners only use pictures from students who direct message, or DM, them for their 8,300 followers to see.

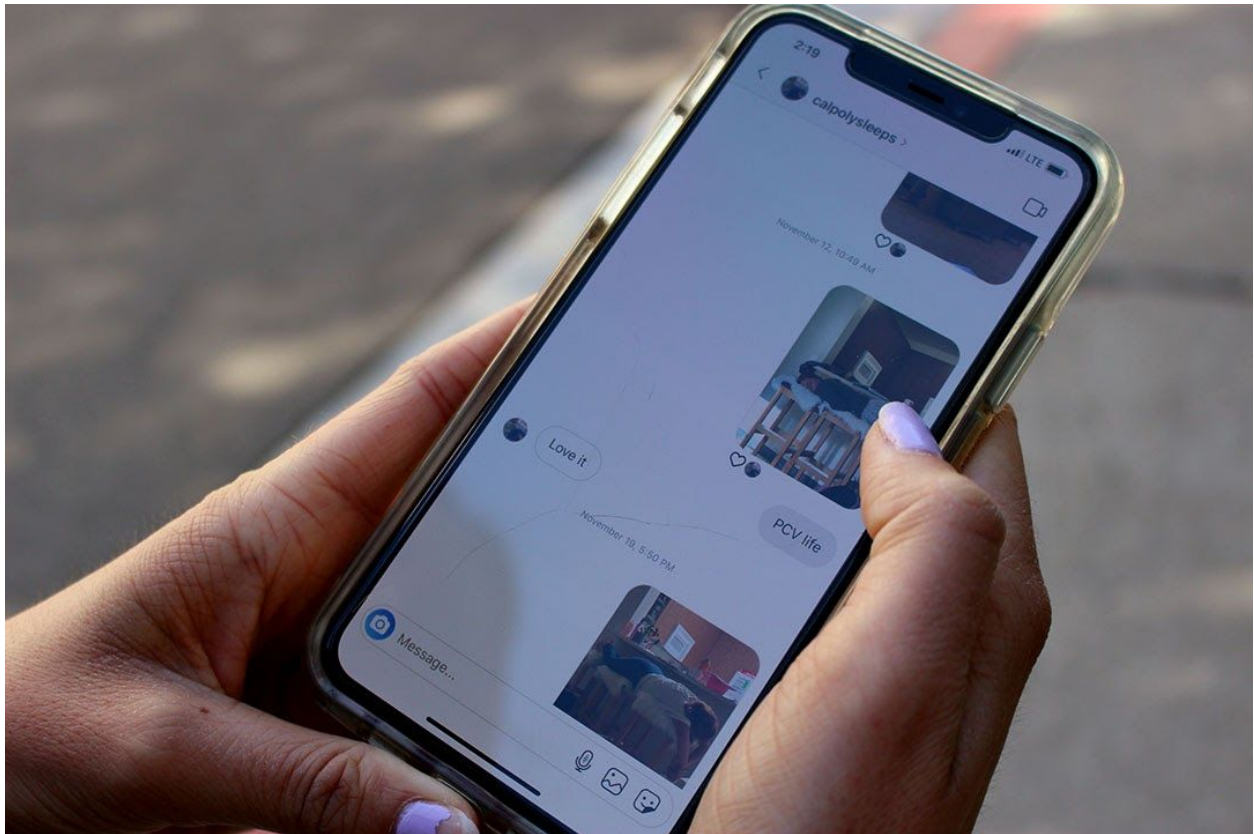

After getting her first picture shared on Cal Poly Sleeps story during last year's Week of Welcome, Makayla Diaz, a second year Liberal Studies Major, has kept trying to get more pictures posted by sending over 50 pictures of others sleeping.

Makayla finds a stranger sprawled out taking a break from their homework in the University Union while checking her favorite sites to catch people napping. Holding her laughter in, Makayla silently takes the picture and sneaks away hoping she has caught a picture that will be posted on to the main account.

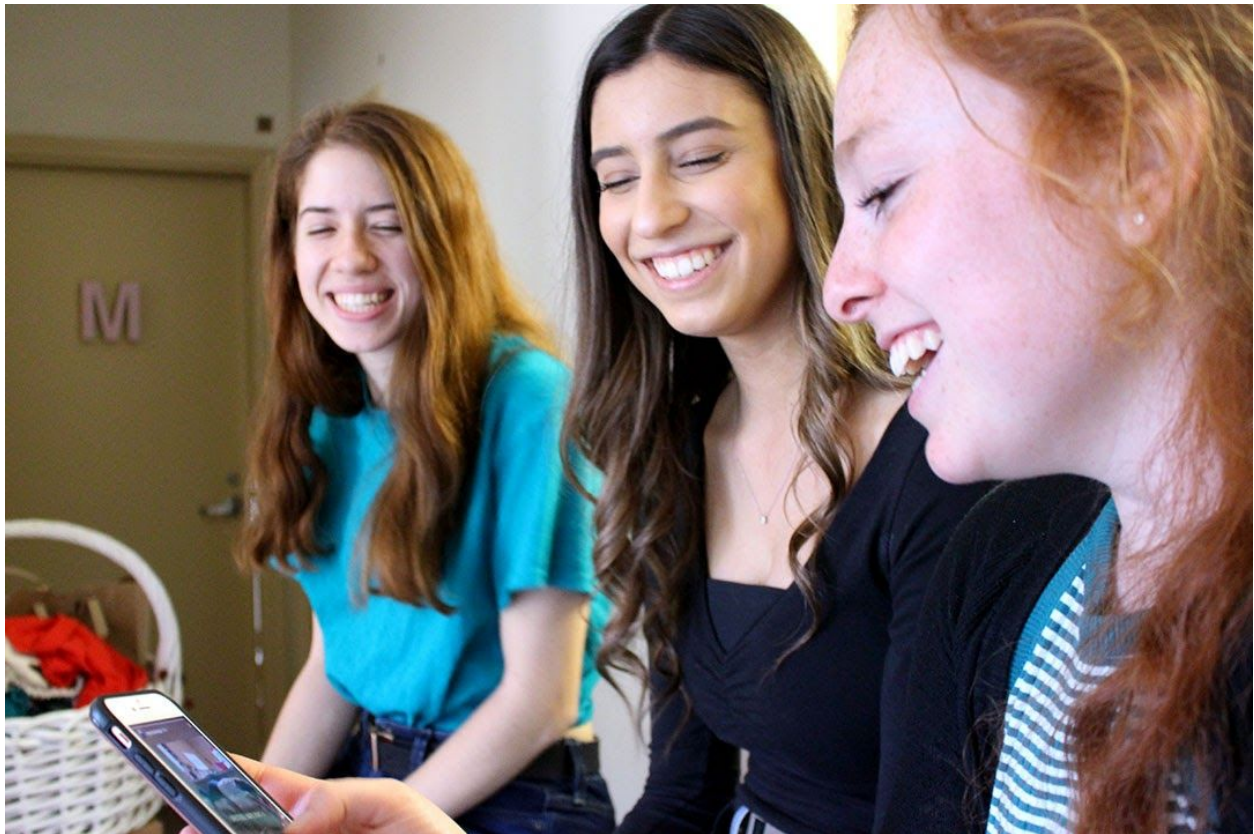

In order to stay away from sending many pictures of strangers sleeping, which she admits feeling awkward about, Makayla has made a game of directly messaging pictures with her roommates, who are all also on board.

Heather Bootzin, a second year Psychology major, Makayla, and Maddie Slous, a second year Liberal Studies major, share a digital picture album they add to when they catch each other napping in awkward positions around their Poly Canyon apartment.

Though all of them get shared onto the account story, Maddie feels like she is a good sport for being the one with the most appearances on the account, by being shared seven times on the story and appears on two of the official posts.

(Optional because it doesn't have the right dimensions, but if it can work, I'd love to post it)

Maddie is known for being the original sleeper in what is now the roommates' legacy, the "Fuzzy Barstool" series.

Makala has also been shared on the account story a few times but claims to have been the most embarrassing picture after being posted when sleeping in the front row of a Statistics lecture.

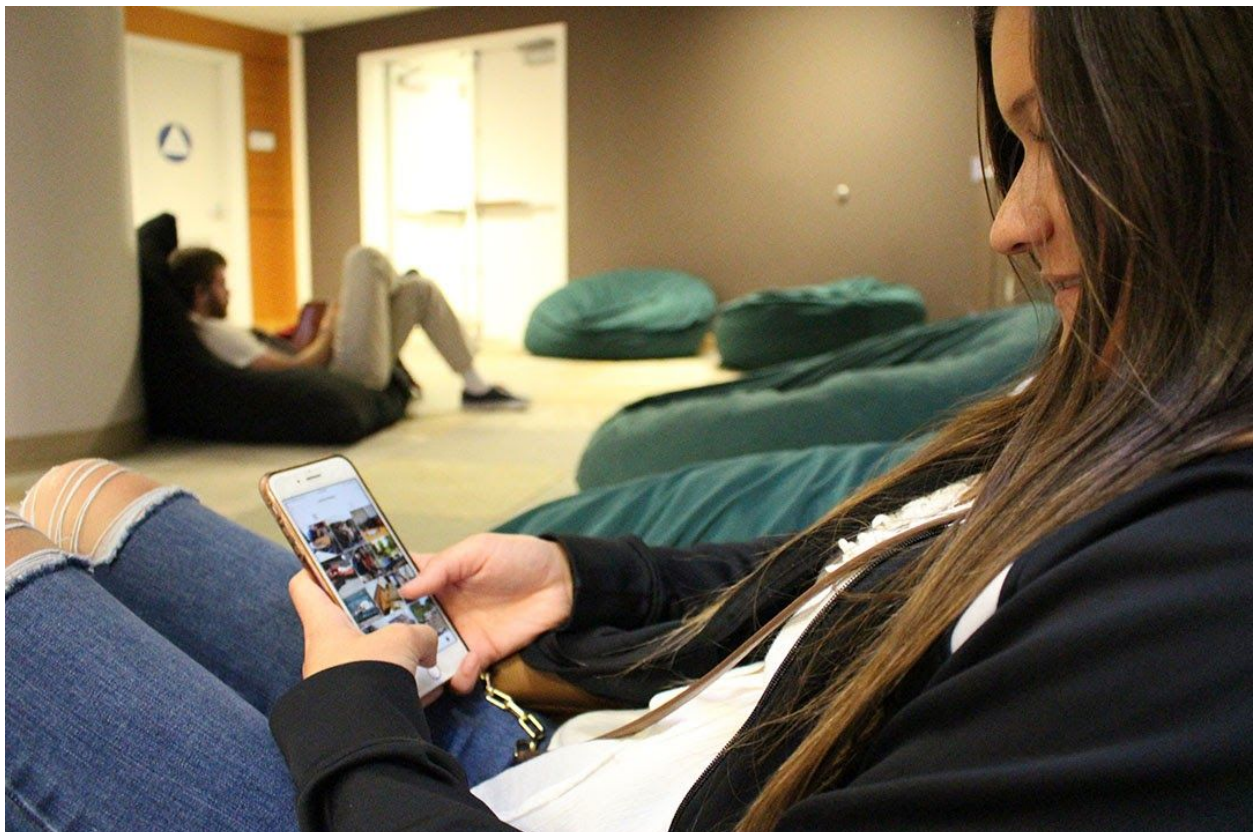

As a team member on the diving team, Kelsey Titterington finds it funny to take pictures of other tired athletes and friends she has caught sleeping during her first year as a Business major.

After long and tiring practices, Kelsey shares that if it weren't for the comfortable lounges in the Mott gymnasium, her only posts would be of unsuspecting nappers in her classes.

Kelsy has currently gotten all of her sent pictures posted on to the Calpolysleeps story, a feat she blames on athletes being tasked with "homework and practices make them knock out where ever."

Even though she shares pictures of others sleeping,, Kelsey checks in with the account holder that if she were ever posted on the account, that she would be able to ask them to remove the picture because she doesn't want her friends to ever catch her napping.